

A detailed black and white line drawing of a prehistoric bird, likely a Phorusrhacidae. The bird is depicted in profile, facing right, standing on a rocky, uneven surface. It has a very long, straight, and slightly curved beak. Its head is topped with a crest of long, dark feathers. The body is covered in a pattern of overlapping scales or feathers, with a distinct ridge running down the center of its back. Its legs are long and powerful, with large, sharp claws. The overall style is that of a scientific illustration, with fine lines and cross-hatching used for shading and texture.
